TECH TIP

Mosquitoes are a fast-reproducing pest and controlling them can be challenging. For your mosquito control program to be successful, it is important to consider several factors such as mosquito species and density, time of the year, surrounding vegetation, presence/absence of constructions/buildings, rainfall, available products, control methods of choice, and more.

Inspecting the surroundings of a given site for a mosquito control program implementation is key, for the program to achieve the desired results. Larviciding large bodies of water, reduces the mosquito pressure in the area and the frequency of adulticide applications. Likewise, proper sanitation (IPM) reduces the visible sites for mosquito larvae breeding. Starting treatments (larviciding in particular) early in the season, prevents the adult mosquito population from growing before the first adulticide application is done.

Products designed with the unique auto-dissemination technology, are an effective and preventative control method for mosquito reduction early in the season and a method to keep mosquito populations sustainably low throughout the season. Autodissemination of a larvicide to cryptic mosquito breeding sites happens when mosquitoes are contaminated with biocides inside the In2Care Station, by landing on a (electrostatically charged) gauze. Mosquitoes then transport the larvicide and contaminate hard-to-find breeding sites around the Stations. The mosquito also gets infected with an insect-specific fungus that kills her before she can spread disease. All larvae inside the Station die, larvae in the surrounding mosquito cryptic breeding sites die too and ultimately, adult mosquitos are killed.

Please contact your local Target Specialty Products location for more information. Always read and follow all label instructions.
